The HPU student body is culturally diverse with representatives from all 50 states and more than 100 countries. Academic programs combine practice, theory and the skills needed in modern career fields. Students learn to implement the latest developments in computer technology, business simulations, communications theory, strategic planning, nursing, diplomacy and military studies. Graduates are well prepared for success in today's rapidly changing marketplace.

The average age of graduate students at Hawaii Pacific University is 25 years old. In various courses throughout the program, students are formed into teams to solve problems collectively and to achieve a better understanding of group dynamics and challenges, while producing specific desired results. Hands-on experience is gained through internships with leading Honolulu corporations. For example, students work in accounting, human resource management and marketing internships, to name but a few.

Honolulu's leading corporations sponsor students for internships, many of which eventually result in offers of full-time employment. Senior executives of local investment firms, health care systems, banks, schools, law firms and trust companies serve as University Board of Trustees, providing vision and direction for HPU's future.

HPU combines the excitement of an urban downtown campus with the serenity of the windward side of the island. The main campus is located in downtown Honolulu, the business and financial center of the Pacific. Just eight miles away is the Hawai'i Loa campus, situated in the foothills of the Koolau Mountains. HPU is also affiliated with the Oceanic Institute, a 56 acre research facility that is located on the windward shores of Oahu just steps from the Pacific Ocean. Graduate housing is available near the downtown campus.
